Medical professionals play a significant role in forging, severing, and reshaping people’s intimate associations when they provide services such as abortion, IVF, sex reassignment surgery, surrogacy, and separating conjoined twins. Given the moral complexity of some types of intimate associations, medical professionals have duties to reflect long and hard before they provide (or withhold) such services.

Kimberley Brownlee, DPhil is an Associate Professor of Philosophy at the University of Warwick. Her recent work has focused on civil disobedience, conscientious objection, conscience, conviction, and punishment. Her current work focuses on social rights, freedom of association, and social virtues. She is the author of Conscience and Conviction: The Case for Civil Disobedience (Oxford University Press 2012).

Lecture Hall 2002 is one floor directly above the main lobby of Duke University Hospital.